The Tanimoto Meeting can be described as a "must-see" event. It provided us with opportunities to present our research to a large audience, to network with others in our field, and to stimulate my career development while I was still studying abroad. I am grateful for the experience, but I felt somewhat isolated, especially given the presence of a large number of researchers from other countries. However, I continue to pursue my research and stay active in the field.

I started working as an assistant professor at Osaka Science Center last February and am currently in the final stages of my Ph.D. candidature at University in the States. As I had been looking to take the next step in my career, I thought that the Tanimoto Meeting would be a valuable opportunity to open doors in Japan. Young researchers outside Japan don’t have too many chances to present their research in public, so I hope you take this opportunity to actively share information, develop new research ideas and boost your career.
